CONTRIBUTING THOUGHTS FROM PAUL DORGER:

The average lifespan of a worker bee in summer is six weeks. In the winter, with no foraging activity, a worker's average lifespan will approach 20 weeks - nearly five months. Since it takes 21 days from the time the queen lays a fertilized egg until it emerges as a worker, the eggs your queen lays in August will be the workers that get the colony through the winter.

In August you want to test for varroa mites, and, if necessary, treat using one of the many methods available. Only treat after you remove honey supers. A colony of bees will die during winter due to one of three reasons. First, disease; second, starvation; third, excessive moisture. To prevent starvation lift the back of your hive, if two 10 frame deeps, make sure it weighs at least 60 pounds. If not, you will need to feed sugar syrup, 2 parts sugar to one part water, to assist them.

A good insurance policy is to add a candyboard. The candyboard has two components, one is the candy the second is the frame to hold it. I made my own frames, see below for one that can be purchased, and I only use sugar and water for the candy. I don't add a pollen patty. The hardened sugar will absorb moisture during the winter, a good thing, and by doing so it makes it easier for the bees to consume should they run out of honey. Every time I open a hive in late winter and see how much of the candyboard has been eaten, I am glad I added it.

Good luck.
